Art ideas are introduced in small classes, and one on one instruction is the norm. Students are encouraged to produce their best work in all media using professional paints, brushes and papers. The goal is positive reinforcement of each child's abilities and creativity. The student does not need to have "talent" but must be interested in creating art, cartoons, books, poems etc.

Older teens may develop a portfolio of work for admission to architecture, design, and art schools. Liberal arts colleges are also interested in a student's creative abilities. But most importantly, each teen or pre-teen has an opportunity to express their creativity in an art studio setting, and a home filled with paintings, statues, art books, fountains and flowers. Classes held outdoors, weather permitting.

Oil painting and watercolor painting, drawing, cartooning, perspective, human figure drawing and one "food-art" lessons are taught each week. All supplies included except oil canvases.

Beth Neville has taught art to teens and adults in colleges, schools and through the Milton Art Museum School. She holds degrees from Smith College and the Harvard Graduate School of Education. Neville's biography is listed in Who's Who in America. For more information and to view Beth's work, visit: www.NevilleArt.com.
